I plan on making my website a personal portfolio that acts somewhat as a resume to show off some of my previous design work. I taught myself how to use photoshop in middle school, and have since accumulated a very diverse and random collection of designs. While I plan to include previous work I have done, my main goal for this project is to lay out a nice interface/groundwork for a professional portfolio that I can continuously update and build upon in the future. If I create something that I am artistically proud of or simply just build upon my professional qualifications, I hope this website will become a place I can add these progressions to. Additionally, one of my main priorities while creating this website is to make it impressive from a design sensibility standpoint and a raw web design skill standpoint. I want it to be a testament to all the skills I've developed in just this one short semester. With all that being said, I am shooting for a very clean, minimalistic style (I pretty much always gravitate towards this), but with a little added spice to make the website more interesting and memorable.
